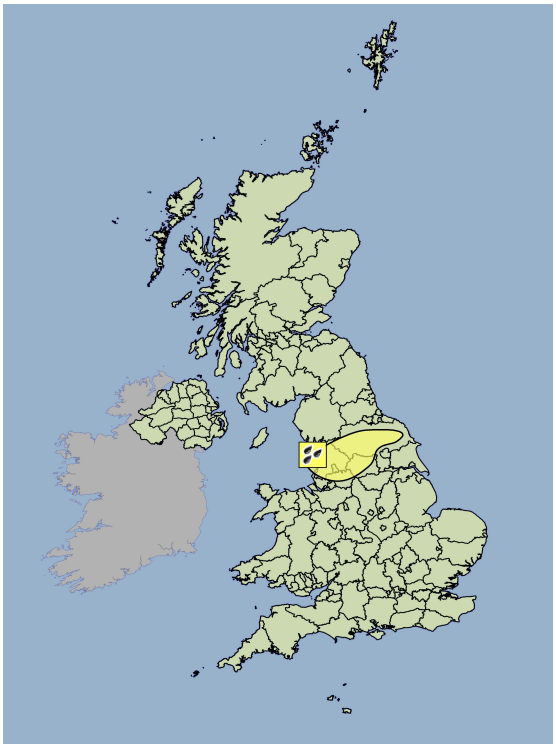
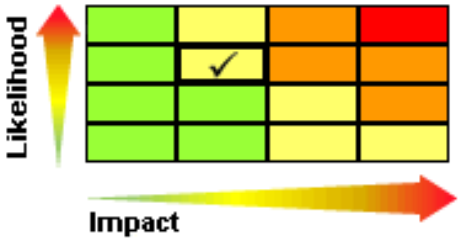
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A series of low pressure systems will bring mild and moist air to northern England on Monday and again on Tuesday, along with some strong winds. This may lead to some large rainfall accumulations over high ground, with 30-40 mm falling quite widely over the two days, and possibly around 60 mm over high ground. Whilst lowland areas are expected to see smaller rainfall amounts, localised flooding is still possible as the water moves downstream through the river network - indeed some rivers may continue to rise on Wednesday, despite the rainfall easing.

There is some uncertainty around the behaviour of individual weather systems and so also regarding the persistence of the rainfall. Further updates are therefore likely in the coming days.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 09:00 on Mon, 30th Nov 2015 until 23:45 on Tue, 01st Dec 2015

Rain is expected to move across northern England from early on Monday, with the largest rainfall totals over high ground. This should clear southwards later on Monday before returning from the south on Tuesday. With this rainfall following the wet November, the ground is saturated and rivers are expected to rise in response.

This is an update to remove Cumbria from the warning area, because it is now expected to receive lesser amounts of rain, and as a result, lower impacts.

Please be aware of the potential for localised disruption from flooding, even away from the heaviest rainfall as the water moves through the river network.
